

Waiting For You

This song was written as a sort-of dialogue between me and my first wife, and was a reflection of the sad realization that the relationship was not at all what it seemed at first; that disappointment and disillusionment had settled in. It was an attempt at saying on my part, that I wanted a relationship in which I could know and see what was going on in her mind and that I wanted to be the one in her eyes.

The song used a format that I'd use frequently in the future; a portion of the song is a female vocal, singing softly in the background. I always enjoyed hearing songs that were duets, with the female vocal really expressing the portion of the lyric that was to come from her heart. I would find out though, just how difficult it was to find a female vocalist to make those parts a reality in the recordings.

This song was written a long, long time ago. Yet here in the present I realize that I'm still, after all these years... waiting for you.
