Rocks In The Road

words by Steve Kuryla music by John Dandrea

This poem of Steve's was really special to me, and right from the start I felt that the verses were so lyrical that it was bound to come out as a song.

I can clearly recall the bus ride to work one day, and in my mind I was hearing a wonderful harmony part to the words of "there's rocks in the road". By the end of that day I had worked out the music to the entire song and was anxious to get it recorded for Steve to hear. It became one of the songs we played the most during our several years of playing and working on our music together.

"I hope that when we all get back, I'll be able to see - all the faces of all my friends the happy way they used to be."

There's Rocks in the Road everywhere I go....
