

Enough Time

Well, here is that “Time” concept again. Seems like I must have been obsessed with looking back, looking ahead, and trying to make sense of life’s twists and turns. No wonder it was “all a blur in my mind and so hard to see”. . . .

At this particular time, I had just lost a very dear friend and mentor, a very great influence in my life. But it was he who taught me that through faith in Jesus, there is no “end” whenever our mortal bodies finally give way and fail. There is only a transition, and a moving on to much bigger and better things, and that God is always in control of His great universe.

Many people can’t get their head around this concept – and they blame God for the bad things that happen. But the truth is, not only are none of us meant to live forever in this world, but none of us are promised an easy or safe life either. Free Will means we make our own choices and suffer consequences as well.

“There’ll never be enough time. . . .”

We all want more time. Sometimes we get it. But eventually – our time is up and it’s off to the next part of our existence. I believe – we do go on and that we meet our Creator and that there will be a final time of judgment, for a final time of existence. Heavy stuff – and yes, this song has some heavy thinking behind it.

This seems an unlikely number to close the album with – being a mellow tune and somber tone to some of the lyrics. But I felt this was the thought – the best collection of thoughts I could choose – to close this important CD with the theme of Time.
