

Love Will Be True

by Scott Seabock

all of your life you've seen the bright colors of love fade through the years as lovers start in celebration and end in tears and each go their own separate ways now you're afraid that just as those before have played and lost the game somewhere down the road you and I will end the same all I know is if we'll look no further than here today love will be true to us like a mother to her children love will still be new to us every day this dream we're building faithful through a lifetime in all that we endeavor no greater gift could I find than to open each days treasures with you forgetting the past like the dawn forgets the stormy night before and the hope of spring that closes winters door there's no need to fear what will be for if tomorrow never comes to satisfy the plans we've made and if the world around us somehow falls away I know whatever's left for you and me

love will still be new to us every day this dream we're building

and as the years are passing through we'll look back and say remember the day we became as one just look how far our lives have come together we've learned to depend on the strength of love we know will never end
